One day at school, our science teacher told us to team up and write a report. I found some classmates and we began our work. At first, we were just talking about our own ideas without listening to others. Then when we began to do the report, everything went terribly because we couldn't find a way to work together. All of us looked impatient and mad with each other because nothing had been done. Suddenly, we all started arguing loudly and our fight was all anyone could hear in the room. After arguing for a long time, one of my classmates had a suggestion. He told us to try to listen to other people's points, then discuss the advantages and disadvantages of the ideas, so we could find the best way to do the report. His suggestion ended up being useful. All of us calmed down and listened to each other. We found out things got easier when we gathered all of our thoughts. At last, we finished our report perfectly and learned that listening to others points makes teamwork easier.
